NATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC™

DEAR TRAVELER,

Because you live near the West Coast, you definitely have “the home court advantage.” Every year, travelers from the Midwest, the East Coast, even Europe and Australia fly for hours to join us to experience waters rich in whales, sea lions, harbor seals, and studded with pods of killer whales, among the most interesting animals on earth to many scientists, and among the most photogenic to nature photographers. They’re drawn by the abundant wildlife, and the calm, picturesque waters—a dream to explore aboard our nimble expedition ship, and even more intimately by using our fleet of Zodiacs, kayaks and paddle boards. And to enjoy the fabled wildness and wonder of this region, you just have a short hop to Seattle and/or Vancouver— lucky!

So, if you haven’t already done so, I invite you to experience the diverse nature, native culture and beauty in your own backyard, so to speak. Be among the first to explore these waters aboard the brand-new National Geographic Quest—the only expedition ship of its kind to be built in Washington state, on beautiful Whidbey Island. Proudly made in America, National Geographic Quest is designed to navigate these waters—threading slender channels and cruising bays, inlets and islands with ease, where large cruise ships cannot go. And she’s a spacious, gracious, and supremely comfortable mobile base camp—rewarding your desires to explore, enjoy the delicious bounty of the region, and retire to a wonderful cabin after each eventful day.

We also have friends here, which is why we can bring you to incredible places off the beaten path and offer private receptions and visits with people who truly care about this region.

I hope you’ll take advantage of your proximity to explore British Columbia and the San Juan Islands with us.

All the best,

Sven-Olof Lindblad
